Excerpt: .living-rooms look over the lake and the surrounding country. In the interior of Brancalone there are none of the rich decorations and sumptuous works of art by the great masters which adorn that of the Montelupi palace in Rome. The rooms are remarkable only for their great size and height, and for their number. In the majority of them, the white plaster walls are only relieved by fulllength portraits of dead and gone Montelupi, while here and there the red robes of some cardinal of the family, or the picture of some bygone lady of the house in her embroidered satin and jewelled stomacher, lend some little colour and variation to the surrounding monotony of their grim-looking relatives in armour or sombre black velvet. The ceilings, unlike the gorgeous inspirations of Guercino and Domenichino in the great rooms of the Roman palace, are entirely...
