II I The Education of the Human Race. i. Analysis. Hugo Goring, in the nineteenth volume of Lessing s Sdmtliche Werke in the Cotta Library, writes the following introduction to Lessing s tractate: The first half of this profound treatise, Lessing published in 1777 with the four Wolfenbuttel Fragments of an Unknown. (J SS). In the summer of 1777 he wrote the second half. In 1780 the conclusion appeared. In the meantime occurred the production of the dramatic poem Nathan the Wise. With the publication of the first 53 paragraphs, Lessing had remarked by way of self-criticism: The author of this work may not be, by any means, so heterodox as he, at first sight, appears to be. He develops, in the course of his work, the relation of education to revelation; secures an insight into the stages of education and the progress of mankind; founds thereon his thoughts of true toleration; and arrives at an hypothesis of the transmigration of souls,1 upon which, to be sure, some small worth is to be laid but in which is to be discerned in a very much less degree the effective power of Lessing s conception of the world. In regard to this, Kuno Fischer remarks: It needed no palingenesis to perceive in the religions the great educational stages of mankind and thence to attain that religious point of view which rises high above trammelled faiths and instigates the virtue of true toleration, the...
