People use integrity as a holistic concept, judging the integrity of systems in terms of those systems ability to achieve their own goals. Some people see integrity as the quality of having a sense of honesty and truthfulness. I believe that honesty and truthfulness should always be at the forefront of all our interactions with others. I also believe that any government, in existence, should practice this very simple course of action. Sadly, honesty and truthfulness have gone by the way of wooden ships and iron men. To make matters worse, we have subjugated our troops to an area of the world where honesty has become a four letter word. The Iraqi government is basically riddled with corruption and criminals and probably beyond the reach of anticorruption investigators. The extensive corruption within the Iraqi government has strategic consequences by decreasing public support for the U.S.-backed government and by providing a source of funding for Iraqi insurgents and militias. In simple terms your basic Iraqi wandering about trying to locate his next meal, views the United States as an enabler, for a corrupt and in many ways dangerous government. But this is really nothing new, to anyone who has followed the disaster we have created in Iraq, over the past seven years. The United States has built a House of Cards at the expense of far too many American lives and Iraqi lives. There is no possible way the Iraqis can maintain the type of security needed to keep their government from collapsing. That has been in evidence this past fall of 2009....
